

White-Winged Duck

Native to South East Asia
Critically Endangered

This large duck used to have a wide distribution throughout South East Asia, including India, Malaysia, Vietnam, and many other countries. However, due to habitat destruction and water pollution these birds are now one of the most endangered birds in the world. This bird has even been declared extinct in certain native countries. They are shy birds, so it is difficult to know how few are left, but estimates are over 80% are gone.
